She says that the Negroes are very prosperous in the South but are kept covered down by the southern white man. She relates this incident: "The train on which I traveled was provided with two Jim Crow coaches. After crossing the Kansas line all Negroes were ordered to go into the Jim Crow cars and the white men who had been riding comfortably in these cars were likewise requested to go into the cars provided for their race of people. There being no room for these forty or fifty white men to sit, they were compelled to stand all night and part of the next day. They objected strenuously to this arrangement, contending that they should be permitted to sit since there were only five or six Negroes in each of the Jim Crow cars; the conductor replied that they were the men who made the laws and would have to abide by them."
